National Alligator Day

It's time to honor one of the oldest living species on Earth - the alligator - on National Alligator Day, May 29th! It is estimated that alligators have been around for 200 million years, and they are some of the most fascinating creatures in nature.

Despite their fearsome appearance and reputation, alligators are crucial to the good health and proper balance of a wetland ecosystem. Alligators are the “crowd control” of those ecosystems. They control the populations of smaller reptiles, mammals, fish, and amphibians by preying on them. This helps maintain a balance in the ecological system, which in turn benefits other species living in the area. So take time today to learn more about incredible animals, and we'll see you later, alligator!

DID YOU KNOW?

Genghis Khan's Tomb

Genghis Khan's tomb remains a mystery, 800 years after his death. He requested a secret burial, and his soldiers killed anyone they passed during his funeral procession to hide the location. Many believe his tomb is in Mongolia, but the search area is massive. Mongolians today view the search for Khan's tomb as disrespectful and against his final wishes. They honor his request for a secret burial and hold it as a sign of respect.
