National Johnny Appleseed Day

One of two days that we celebrate this great American legend, March 11th is the day we commemorate the death of Johnny Appleseed.

Although disputed by some, March 11th, 1845 is generally accepted as the day Johnny Chapman, AKA Johnny Appleseed died from the “winter plague.” He was born on September 26, 1774, which is the other day he is celebrated. A nurseryman by trade, Johnny started out planting trees in western New York and Pennsylvania before heading west, selling apple trees and seeds to settlers while also planting more along the way. A fun fact you may not know is that the apple trees he planted were not intended for eating as they were very tart.

DID YOU KNOW?

Wakey Wakey....

When animals wake from hibernation, they primarily rely on an internal biological clock triggered by changes in environmental cues like temperature and day length, causing them to gradually increase their metabolic rate and body temperature, effectively "waking up" when conditions are suitable for foraging again; this "wake-up" signal is regulated by the hypothalamus in the brain, allowing them to sense changes in the environment and initiate the process of coming out of hibernation.
