Dictionary Day

Today is Dictionary Day, which means it's time to celebrate the birth of Noah Webster, who is responsible for publishing the very first dictionary way back in 1806. Twenty-seven years later, in 1828, Webster published his very own dictionary, which contained useful words and spelling updates he compiled and expanded on. Born on October 16th, 1758, in Hartford, Connecticut, Webster was the son of a farmer. At the age of 16, he enrolled at Yale, which was the very first college in Connecticut. He then decided to go into teaching, as law was too expensive.

His goal was to reform America's academic system and language, and in 1801, he began to define many of the terms that set apart American English from the way the language was spoken in England.

Today in History

In 1986, Chuck Berry's 60th birthday was celebrated with a concert organized by Rolling Stones guitarist Keith Richards. The show took place at the Fox Theatre in St. Louis, Missouri, and included performances by Richards, Etta James, Linda Ronstadt, and Eric Clapton, among others.

DID YOU KNOW? Iron-Clad Scoops

Beyond her famous undercover exposé of a mental asylum, Nellie Bly once ran an iron manufacturing company. After her husband's death, she took over the Iron Clad Manufacturing Co., which produced steel containers. She became an inventor, patenting a new milk can and a stacking garbage can, demonstrating her ingenuity and business acumen were as sharp as her journalistic skills.
